

China and the EU, the world's largest car markets, have become the automobile industry's dominant regulatory powers. Since 2015, the EU has imposed increasingly strict emission and fuel-efficiency standards for new cars, including its latest rules taking effect in 2025. Meanwhile, China has ambitiously targeted that 20% of all new cars be partially or fully electrified by 2025 and is considering eventually banning internal combustion engines entirely. Tightening standards pose a challenge to automakers, requiring them to invest heavily in new and sometimes untested technologies. In the near-term, some are avoiding fines only by heavily subsidizing their least-polluting and most fuel-efficient models.

German luxury automaker BMW has stayed ahead of the regulatory changes, leaving many of its competitors behind. While other companies faced production delays, BMW's European sales grew faster than its peers last year as more of its models already met the EU's standards. BMW's preparedness for regulations is likely to continue to pay off: it expects to meet the EU's aggressive 2021 carbon dioxide targets ahead of most peers, in part by offering at least 10 electrified models (battery or plug-in hybrid) by the end of 2020. Competitors that cannot hit these targets will face hefty penalties. In China, BMW's focus on technological innovation aligns with the rising regulatory hurdles. By 2025, the company will offer at least 25 electrified vehicles globally, including 12 fully electric models. The decision to offer many choices along the gasoline-electric spectrum should generate more sales in a market with evolving regulations and varying customer preferences.
