

UK online property portal Rightmove was founded in 2000 with the simple mission of connecting house-and-apartment hunters with available properties and their real estate agents. At first, the site was free to everyone. As the number of site visitors grew, Rightmove started charging agents to list their offerings. More homes and apartments on offer attracted more visitors, which led to higher fees. And so began a virtuous circle that continues today. Over one million UK properties are listed on the site, which logged 1.6 billion visits last year. With 75% market share, agents and buyers have little choice but to use Rightmove, and its market dominance is a durable source of pricing power. Last year, it raised its listing fees despite a weak UK housing market. Its profits grew 11%.

The property-portal market still has room to grow. Nearly half of a UK property agent's marketing budget today is spent on print media, such as leaflets stuffed in mailboxes and newspaper ads. Going forward, we believe agents' spending will continue to shift online, and Rightmove is the company most likely to benefit from this trend.
