

Hearing-aid manufacturers have historically enjoyed strong growth and wide profit margins thanks to humanity's advancing average age and supportive regulations. In most parts of the developed world, regulators require hearing loss sufferers to be diagnosed and fitted by licensed audiologists. Often solo practitioners, these specialists have little bargaining power with the manufacturers and typically carry just one brand, restricting the consumer's ability to comparison shop. Exclusive distribution deals have discouraged competitors from trying to enter market. Meanwhile, incumbent companies have found additional growth by consolidating. Today, 98% of the world's hearing aids are made by just six manufacturers.

The favorable competitive landscape is changing. In Europe, large retail chains specializing in hearing health are competing with, or taking over, independent audiologists' practices. In the US, big retailers like Costco have opened audiologist-staffed "hearing centers" and are demanding lower prices from manufacturers. A greater change is coming in 2021, when US regulators will allow basic hearing aids to be sold without an audiologist's assistance.

Our sole industry holding is Sonova, a Swiss-based manufacturer that controls 25% of the hearing-aid market by sales. Like several of its peers, it has pursued a vertical integration strategy by acquiring audiologists' offices and specialized retail chains. In addition, Sonova's recent product launches are strengthening its position as a leading maker of premium devices for severe hearing loss—a segment of the market less likely than basic models to see unfettered competition.
